Whether it be new by itself or new in combination with anything else, the sense of taste is the sense that best reveals the spiritual. This is why the Buddha went to great lengths to train his disciples to develop the discernment of taste. From this sense, you should know that all forms and sounds are changed for the temporary mind. You should know that your body will die; your feeling will cease; and the sound you hear will cease. You should know that only the consciousness of the Buddha is permanent. You should know that all phenomena have no self; they are all six temporary; and if you see them without discriminating, you will finally enter Nirvana. You should know that they are neither created nor destroyed. You should know that impermanence and incompleteness are the three characteristics of Nirvana. You should know that all phenomena are neither mental nor physical. You should know that these three are the three characteristics of the Infinite. They are the result of the wisdom of the Universal Vow. You should know that the afflictions, the veils, suffering and its opposite, peace, are causally transmitted through the five aggregates. You should know that they are neither real nor unreal, and they are neither extinguished nor ceased. You should know that every movement of the body is conjoined with a sound. You should know that no matter is permanent; that if the body is changed, the mind is also altered; and that if the mind is transformed, the consciousness of all phenomena will cease. You should know that the nature of what is heard is unknown; and that if you differentiate what is heard, you will stop hearing it. You should know that the nature of what is heard is unknown; and if it is heard without differentiation, you will enter Nirvana. You should know that the nature of what is seen is unknown
