This invention relates to the field of data-driven controlling apparatuses and methods for controlling their more particularly to apparatuses and methods for controlling the operation of a steam generator using data derived from the analysis of operating conditions of the steam generator. Currently, there are many different methods of control that attempt to maximize the performance of steam generators in terms of steam output. One of the ways in which these methods have been used is to compare the operating conditions with the operating parameters of the steam generator in order to determine the least efficient operating parameter for the given operating conditions. Typically, a given steam generator system will have a varying set of operating parameters related to its production process. These operating parameters are monitored on a routine basis for their operation. The comparison of the monitoring data with the operating parameters is then used to optimize the operation of the steam generator system. The monitoring of the operating parameters of a steam generator system is typically carried out by an operator. For example, an operator may look at a visual display representative of the operating parameters of the steam generator system and then manually record the information. The information recorded is then analyzed to determine whether the operating parameters of the steam generator system are operating within the expected parameters. By this method, the quality of the information being recorded and analyzed is dependent upon the quality of the operator""s ability to correctly enter the values on the visual display or to record the correct information. Further, the reliance on a human operator is often not timely enough to inform the steam generator of the changes in operating parameters that are optimum for its performance. In view of the problems with present methods of monitoring the operational parameters of a steam generator system, there has been a long felt need in the art for a method of controlling a steam generator system that is accurate, reliable and minimizes the need for human intervention. A method of controlling the operation of a steam generator system is disclosed. The method includes the use of a control system that controls the operation of the steam generator system based on data collected from the steam generator system. The data collected from the steam generator system includes the pressure of fluid flowing through a portion of the steam generator system. The control system includes a controller that receives the data from the steam generator system and a data analysis device that analyzes the data to determine a set of operating parameters representative of the operating conditions of the steam generator system. The controller then controls the operation of the steam generator system in response to the data analysis device. The steam generator system may be controlled by a controller that receives the data from
