After years of exposure to Photoshop, Lightroom feels like a step back – a breathless, half-baked version of a plugin-free Adobe program simply because it inhales plugins. Lightroom is highly capable, but the inability to customize individual features such as your brush settings feels cumbersome, especially for those who care deeply about photoshop tools and want to experience Lightroom's other capabilities. The problem with Lightroom 5 though is that they set it aside as a separate application, not as part of Photoshop. If they had integrated it into Photoshop, they could have created a wonderful product that may have convinced more users to switch to Adobe software. Unfortunately, Lightroom 5 with it's separate applications and plugins, creates a product that is more like a collection of apps and plugins than a cohesive product. I'm sure that Lightroom 5 will improve as time passes and Adobe's other products improve. Until then, I recommend staying away from this version of Lightroom, and opting for a cheaper standard edition. I also urge you to give Lightroom 4 a try and give Lightroom 5 a pass until it truly makes sense as a Lightroom 5 without a Lightroom 4. I have taken a look at the Lightroom 5 Usability features I believed would be most helpful to industry professionals. In what may be viewed as a drawback, the latest version of Lightroom does not have a customer support feature that allows you to obtain help and even e-mail them directly. Also, you cannot enter Lightroom's automation presets to customize the output of the application.

While other designers such as web designers work on mobile screens, so their designs are small in size. Beyond this, you can use Photoshop to create entire websites, or even just individual pages. You can design elements such as text, buttons, bullets/lists. This is where your skills come in. Although there are several tools in Photoshop that can assist you in your creation, a lot of times you will still need to hand work in certain elements if they are not already pre-made in the photo.
