In fine form, Adobe has improved the view tooltips. I notice that the most recent update makes new icons appear when you hover the mouse cursor over a panel, tool, or button. They are, frankly, a bit garish, but they are a welcome improvement. There is also a New Toolbox that looks clean and well laid out, but with nothing new to offer. The "Live Presets" panel is well laid out but quite tedious to use. You cannot sort by edit, toaster, or name, but you can sort by names alphabetically. There are 75 presets to choose from, with no way to choose the most used presets within each category. It is a very tedious process to try to find the best option for a particular scenario. Given that the features don't seem to be as streamlined as they could be, and that the editing cycles are lengthy, the editing process could be more efficient if the panel had various tabs that could direct you to the desired settings in the order that you are editing. The new and improved Brush panel is a nice variation on the panel we had in CS6. We can use the right-click to select a preset, although there is no way to filter-by-category. The left-click opens the Brush Settings dialog, but we cannot apply brush settings directly, we must first navigate to the desired settings from the left panel. Lightroom 5 is designed to be a powerful and feature-packed, all-purpose RAW converter that transforms RAW files into well-exposed, pristine, high-quality images. Although Lightroom will not cull any data from the original RAW file, it will resize, crop, and alter the data using different processing settings to optimize the exposure or make color adjustments while maintaining the quality and integrity of the original RAW file.
