Photo: Getty Images After 48 hours of back-and-forth, the public school district in the Pueblo town of Washington voted yesterday to close all city schools for the next five days. The Pueblo City Council, which has the final say on school closures, unanimously approved the plan on Monday. Officials say the reason for the closure: a shortage of non-perishable food, including milk, that has left many school districts and grocery stores across the country ordering large quantities of the shelf-stable product. "This is a very last-resort, because this has happened many times before, that public schools have had to be closed," says Washington School District Superintendent Kent Jenks. "We're not seeing any milk from the grocery stores around here. And we're not seeing any milk anywhere in the state." Despite Washington's proximity to Denver, Colorado's largest city, and several major grocery stores in the area, they've had no luck finding food. According to a press release on the school district's Facebook page, "The Public Health Department and state agriculture department is monitoring the situation and observing all county and state food limits." For some people, this is a surprise. As Jenks explains, closing schools is a last-resort because students who go to school out of town are often not covered by their parent's insurance. "Many of our students come from out of town, and are out of the school system," says Jenks. "So we're a small, rural school district, and a lot of our students can't be insured. So we would close schools for the uninsured." About 60 percent of Washington's 830 students live outside of city limits, according to district statistics. And Jenks says that the closing of schools isn't a bad idea, as most of the students who are affected come from out of town anyway. "I'd be more worried about the children in the community that have the food in the home, and that we're not keeping them safe, or their food supplies," says Jenks. "We're not able to cover all schools in our district, so schools may not be closed in other areas. So our priority is to open schools, protect the children,

1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates generally to the field of hoppers, and more specifically to an improved reversible hopper with a hopper door that is more easily used to dispense a granular product stored therein. 2. Background Art Olive Oils are commonly used for many products, such as a cooking product. Consumers may purchase olive oils at a grocery store or other retail store. However, olive oil is a perishable item that, if not used promptly, could spoil, or may need to be refrigerated for storage. Thus, it is desirable to provide a type of receptacle that stores the olive oil and allows it to be poured out onto a utensil during use. Many such olive oil dispensers are known. The prior art dispensers generally include a relatively large container, often referred to as a "hopper", that holds the olive oil. The hopper has a relatively large opening and is placed on a vertical, elevated shelf. Typically, the olive oil is dispensed by tilting the hopper, so that the opening is positioned over the product to be dispensed. The olive oil may pour out of the hopper into a utensil. Once the hopper is filled, it must be stored, generally, either in a refrigerator or other refrigeration unit, or on a shelf that allows the olive oil to remain at an elevated temperature. The shelves, as noted above, must be elevated to allow gravity feed from the hopper. Thus, to access the olive oil in the hopper, a consumer must stand on a ladder, or other elevated surface, so as to be able to place a container beneath the hopper to dispense the olive oil. While this is the standard method of dispensing olive oil, it requires that a consumer must put aside both legs when standing on a ladder, or other elevated surface, to insert a utensil beneath the hopper. Not only is this inconvenient, but it can be dangerous, as the hand and fingers of the consumer may be pushed off the ladder. Further, the consumer may spill olive oil when standing on the ladder. One attempt to overcome this issue is disclosed in U.S. Pat. No. 5,197,872 to Lobb. Lobb describes a container that may be placed beneath the hopper, thereby allowing a consumer to have both hands free to pour the olive oil. However, Lobb uses a separate component to attach to the hopper
