[The cellular composition of the thyroid glands after X-irradiation]. The count of the thyroid cells were estimated using stereometric photometry in 22 (35%) out of 64 rats receiving total thyroidectomy after the exposure to 30 and 40 Gv, 1 Gv and 5 Gv of X-rays. Then the quantity of the cell nuclei and the nucleolar index of thyroid cells was estimated. The concentration of the thyroid hormones and serotonin were estimated prior to the irradiation and 10 and 45 days later. There was no marked difference between the changes in the cell count in the pre and post radiated rats. 30 days after the exposure, the count of the cell nuclei in thyroid tissue had decreased in those exposed to 40 Gv, 1 Gv and 5 Gv of X-rays. The index of the nucleoli was lowered in rats exposed to 5 Gv of X-rays. 45 days after the exposure, the cell count in those exposed to 1 Gv and 5 Gv had returned to the values recorded prior to the exposure. In the rats exposed to 30 Gv the cell count and the nucleolar index did not differ from the pre-exposure values. The cell count, serotonin content, the thyroid hormone concentrations did not differ. Akt kinase is hyperactivated in a subset of human prostate cancers, a finding that can be associated with increased expression of the Na⁺/H⁺ exchanger, NHE1. NHE1 appears to be associated with aggressive prostate cancer, and appears to be regulated by protein kinase C via alterations in the Akt-cyclic-AMP response element binding protein pathway. The purpose of this proposal is to determine the in vitro and in vivo effects of downregulating NHE1 on prostate cancer growth, and to characterize the in vivo role of NHE1 in the development and progression of prostate cancer. We have demonstrated that the anti-depressant drug, fluoxetine, significantly reduces NHE1 expression and inhibits cell proliferation of PC-3 prostate cancer cells in culture. We also developed a number of PC-3 human prostate cancer sublines that are transfected with
