It concerns an excellent writer and comedian who later had a very good career as a standup and as a writer for 30 Rock and, later, for the actual comedy program 30 Rock. Mike Ross was the first to be the guy he really was, a complicated character, and later he wrote a book about his experiences. I've watched him a fair amount in the past years. He does a line similar to the one Louis CK says in Punchline once described as "doing dead on pitch," sometimes at a pretty high volume. You can hear it on his You Can't Spell America Without Me webisodes. The clip below is from the mid-'90s shows, from one of his birthdays on MTV. It's from before he became famous, before there were a bunch of funny men playing in front of judges. It's a good show that you should watch a few times. Ross seems like a young guy who is trying to see what the hell this is that he's doing. I've seen some of what he's done since, from college to the very early days of his professional life as a standup. But one of the best things I've ever seen him do was in some number of weeks that I worked in early 1997 at a comedy club in the Boston area. It was a Friday night and some guy from the FBI came and said he wanted to talk to everyone. It turned out that they were interviewing people for the counterfeit goods sting. They showed us their forms and made us fill them out. There was this one kid that had this incredible comedy voice and this kid would say things and then he'd slide down the bar and reach for the light cord and pull it and start laughing. We all got to talk to this guy,

The highest security prison in France is a century old fortress overlooking Marseille, Le Petit-Cerphon. The prison was formerly a military academy for cadets with the motto "qui dort, brise" – "break the silence", as a response to the still celebrated French anthem "La Marseillaise". Prisoners walk the walkway between single cells, often with no occupation other than pacing the concrete walkway in circles. In these voids, prisoners and their former colleagues walk in silence, separated by walls and bars instead of concrete, mortar, and iron bars. The prison population is down to 467 inmates, less than half its peak, and the prison has been transformed into a reception center for migrants. The most common description of this prison sounds apocalyptic. "It looks like a madhouse," says Ulla Schlüter, who works in the prison humanitarian sector. "I was shocked and horrified when I first visited Le Petit Cerphon," she says. The harshness of the buildings means many things to people who come to work here. But the term prison finds its true meaning in the cells themselves – in an orgy of cruelty. The cells are made of concrete and have been built by Henri Prost, a famous prison architect from Lyon. The cells are designed like shoeboxes – they are narrow and long, and divided from each other by small white walls. This width is sufficient for prisoners to stand and sit on the floor without touching each other. Many prisoners here have epilepsy. Many suffer from mental illness. Some are more dangerous than others. There are prisoners with specialized needs. But these are all kept in the same small enclosure. The cells are sectioned. Each section has a maximum capacity of seven persons. The cells often hold six inmates. Prisoners are separated from each other by bars, but windows offer a small view of the outside d0c515b9f4
