So, sit back, relax and enjoy. and the difference in resistance against the current is thus reduced. The addition of the discharge resistance allows the control voltage of the power supply to be lowered. When the ratio of the cell resistance to the discharge resistance is reduced, that is, when the current-supplying capacity of the power supply is increased, the rated current value can be increased. By setting the discharge resistance lower than the constant current charge/discharge current circuit, the reduction of the current-supplying capacity of the power supply by the added discharge resistance can be suppressed to a small degree. In this case, because the power capacity when the rated current is drawn is smaller than when the constant current is supplied, and the cell voltage in the fully charged state is held constant, the reduction of the cell voltage in the fully charged state can be suppressed, thereby improving the charge/discharge characteristics of the secondary battery. Semiconductor laser diode arrays have increasingly been used in applications such as optical disk lasers, printers, document scanners, and video projectors. The performance of a laser diode array is measured in terms of its electrical characteristics and its quality is affected by the repeatability of those characteristics within a single array. An ideal array would have the same characteristics from first laser diode to last laser diode in an array, with minimal change in those characteristics. Unfortunately, laser diodes are known to have non-uniformities that result in an array of lasers that have differing characteristics. These non-uniformities occur in the distribution of the charge carriers in the layers of the diode's structure, and in particular, the distribution of the charge carriers in the active layer (the layer where light is emitted) of the diode. These non-uniformities are caused by a variety of possible non-uniformities in the fabrication process, the subsequent packaging process, and the optical alignment of the array during operation. In particular, the non-uniformities include variations in the doping concentration in the active layer of the diodes, the amount of current
