Reign: Conflict of Nations is a First-Person-Shooter released for the Game Boy Advance (GBA) handheld game console on September 29, 2000, developed by Shikoku Corporation and published by Nintendo for Japan, Natsume for the USA and Pyramid for Europe. It was the fifth and final game in the Reign series, after game reworked for mobile phone. Gameplay Reign: Conflict of Nations is mostly a 3D platform game in which stages take place in a vast scrolling landscape over 3D real-time battlefields (compared to series past 2D point-and-click games) with an option of "free" movement on dynamic, free-running basis and zoom mode for strategic movement over the area. While there is no ability to destroy scenery, there are destructible objects—some of which provide extra points. In stage will appear an unlimited number of enemies which need to be either destroyed or avoided. There are several traditional stages like the Elemental and City phases which are reappear in later game, e.g. ancient Egypt in Egypt, and the Middle Ages in the Crusades, the seventh chapter's stage, but Empire of China and Gulf War from Legacy are new. Reign: Conflict of Nations features two types of weapons to the player, first is the regular weapon which can be given to the player that acquired it as a reward or from defeated enemies, it returns to the player if the player doesn't use it for a while. The second type is the active weapon—the player gives a reactive weapon to an NPC ally which the ally will take charge of the weapon when the player is focusing on using it (ex. dual slash). Each weapon can also have unique parts: the metal and the crystal. The weapons can be partially charged to deliver stronger impact, targeting, direct damage or item gathering. The player can also develop a weapon "part" by combining or attaching several crystal and metal parts of different types.
