

this looks pretty easy :)i'm planning to review your blog - i'm planning to test the code you send me. you can be sure i'll review your code, i'm a code reviewer :) also i want to test your lab - i can report that the exam is done and if i am right, it can be possible to scan network (the most difficult part) to get information about the pc and log of course ;di can be sure this will be very easy for an expert in reversing research :) i can tell you this much. i was a part of a class that is building a network simulator in c++.the first question was "why" why do we need a network simulator?answer = to test the ip protocol, lan protocol, arp protocol, etcthe 2nd question was "how" how do we build it?answer = the teacher used packet tracer (it is an exam-solver).after the class took place, the teacher told me: "look, you did not know how to build a network simulator." (it took me about 3 hours to understand how it worked).do not be scared if you are a newbie.i am not the best person to help you. companies that use the packet tracer are cisco, hp, ibm, compuware, and juniper. it was initially a networking software that was used to help the networking students and professionals with their exam and in your daily work. the software was initially used as a basic tool to configure and examine, but over time it has got more and more attractive with features that make it grow in quality. the instructors now prefer using it for their students so the students can perform network examination and check the networks and security with this software. at the same time students can use these software to test the classroom network and check the changes that are there in the network.
