Prior to this point, the Nvidia Shield had been only available as a cheap $200 Android TV device that came without apps and games. The Shield was intended to be more than just a traditional Android TV box: it's an Nvidia-powered gaming platform that offers premium experiences. But its premium price and exclusive content-creation tools made it a hard sell. Now, it's going to be subsidized by Google Play—but it's just been unveiled in the most unexpected place. "Nvidia announced at CES that the Shield is coming to Google Play. It's no longer available for pre-order," says Nvidia. "We'll be launching the Shield for Android TV on Google Play after the week-long New Year's holiday." The Android TV Shield will be available in 50 countries worldwide. The only available countries that I have a Shield in are Australia, UK, the US, and Canada, and I have no idea when it will come to the rest. The transition from Nvidia's nomenclature to Google's is likely meant to be some kind of soft launch—or at least a slow roll-out in which the Shield gradually becomes available in more countries. After the New Year's holiday, I expect it to become more widespread. The Shield's software also reflects this change. For non-developers, the Google Play edition of the Shield is functionally identical to the nVidia Shield; at CES, Nvidia showed off a near-final version of the Google Play edition with the same front-facing dual-lens camera, same 4GB of RAM, same processor, and so on. 0cc13bf012 materials. In the recent years, different carbon sources have been tested as nanocarbons for adsorbent development in the removal of various pollutants, however, the results obtained are still limited and mostly related to single chemical compounds. In this paper we have focused our interest on activated carbons (ACs) and different mesoporous-derived carbon materials (MDCs) and we have investigated their adsorption capabilities and selectivity towards two other simple aromatic compounds, namely phenol and toluene, which are both of importance for pharmaceutical, agrochemical and automotive industries. The adsorption process in these materials, which are synthesised through a polymer-assisted surfactant templating route, has been modelled by
