There is a predictable outcome of this situation: students are more invested in the problems than in what the problems are actually about. Such an investment is not inherently bad, but is only helpful when a student can draw on his investment in the problems to develop a reasoned assessment of a real-world outcome. In short, students who know the core ideas of algebra and geometry, but who have not really come to know what the problems are about (beyond “I like algebra”) are less likely to make sense out of
