ISO 12232. ISO 2184-1. The ISO standard on color recording is based on the fact that the color that each pixel of a digital image takes depends on the intensity of the light recorded in that particular pixel and the wavelength of that light. The shorter the wavelength, the bluer the color. The longer the wavelength, the more red or violet the color. This is how color photos are produced in film cameras. However, digital images have pixel resolution, NOT light intensity. Each pixel in an image can be represented as a color represented as a number between 0 and 255. While film can only represent light intensity, pixels can represent any color in the visible spectrum, including wavelengths outside of those visible to the human eye. The ISO standard establishes how in image software and cameras should handle color information and digital image interoperability. The standard allows the color of an image to be encoded as the Luma (Y) and Chroma (Cb and Cr) components, where: $Y = 0.299R + 0.587G + 0.114B$ $Cb = 0.521R - 0.487G + 0.419B$ $Cr = 0.713R - 0.686G - 0.062B$ I find it to be questionable with a total of 5% saved as a Jpeg at 1500 dpi, which seems to work out to be way too small. The native resolution is 6000 dpi, and by making 5% of it go to less than pristine, you are absolutely condemning yourself to lose quality. I am using CS3 and I'd be willing to bet that the latest stages of CS3 would work much better than CS3 did. Either that or my system is just becoming obsolete. This also seems to be the problem when you select a file size as large as 1500 dpi. If you use glossy paper, you will have white borders all around your image and the appearance of a weakly lit image becomes more and more apparent as you zoom into smaller portions. What this does is effectively set a "safe file size", and tells the software to "just make a file that is within that safe macro" which of course makes the software go ultra-slow. I'd rather have it come out a little bit out of focus than to sacrifice quality this way. Anyone else find this problematic?

What are blending modes?

Blending modes are a quick way to adjust the way two images interact with one another. For example, you can combine a background image with an image for a more striking background. What is opacity?

Opacity for a layer, or a color doesn't just determine how much or how little light is in that color. The opacity of a color is also a measure of the amount of transparency it contains.
