Well, funny that you say that - I guess you just don't like the look and feel of the 'New' interface. I didn't notice any majorly "ugly" change since 4.2 - so that's certainly new, and I'm not fond of the butchering of the Details tab either.. The DNG previews in the Preview Bin were impressive, especially as I continued using them throughout the day. But I was worried they would somehow reduce performance - which is exactly the opposite. Lightroom is now faster and more snappy while using them. Overall I have a few gripes - but overall, it's a very good update. However it would be nice if they occasionally updated the third-party plugins to the latest versions. Adobe continues to prove that it is a better vendor than it has ever been. A couple of years ago, you could disagree with me until your head hurts. The latest (Adobe Photoshop CS6) product, however, is a fine evolution of the core product. Lightroom is a team effort with, as of this writing, more than 250 contributors from many different photo workflows. A quick perusal of some of the blurbs from contributors reveals the breadth of people's interests and their varied experiences. Consider a few: "I am a master printer with big dreams, and am impressed with this set of tools. [Note: that is from a printer who works in film. I know that printers can be good, and often are specialists in one aspect of the workflow. But I've always been impressed with the number of concentration by Adobe in Photoshop, Lightroom, and now, SpeedGrade. Whenever a new tool is announced, users' comments show a pattern of wanting the tools to work together magically. 'I want this tool to do what you did with the last one.' 'I loved your last tool as well. This has more awesome stuff.' Unfortunately, as one reviewer explained, a lack of user-interface guidelines results in tool combinations that grin and bear each other, much like Shrek's friends. And that is the end." — A Note on Usability

A photographer is someone who can catch a moment in time. It's the only art form where the act of creation is the moment of inspiration. It's also the only art form where the person who creates is the one who experiences the emotion and beauty. Photoshop is the last of my lights. It's my favorite tool. It dominates my workflow. It's what I've done creatively all my life. It's a machine I've learned and relied on. I love the tool for its ability to manipulate my images. But more than that, I'm attracted to its precision. I like that I can bend, break or ignore rules as easily as I can embrace them in Photoshop. Its ethos, its the sum of my knowing. There is beauty in restraint, freedom in rules, and calm in madness. It's not that Photoshop is anything deep. It's not that Photoshop is magical. It's not that Photoshop is anything other than something. It's a little program. It's just the place where I am most comfortable. It's in my blood. Photoshop is the tool I use to do my best work and I love it. e3d0a04c9c

In early October, Adobe released a preview version of Photoshop with a smarter grid feature, which lets users easily create perfect and identical images. The update also includes many other changes, including the ability to shoot raw or DNG files from a RAW camera. The Facebook-powered Share for Review can provide new collaborative capabilities when you're experimenting with Photoshop. Working alongside your colleagues, you can all see at once, which areas of a selection or adjustment are relevant and which are not. The update also enables you to duplicate the changes a colleague makes in order to give yourself an even bigger canvas in which to play. Finally, you can save changes to the photo while also receiving the collaborators' latest changes and interact with their work in real time. Also important to the future development of Photoshop is its ability to work seamlessly across multiple display devices and operating systems. This has long been a concern among image editing tools, but Adobe has taken the lead in this area and is making significant headway. The new checks for web compatibility have resulted in more bi-directional communication between the desktop applications and web browsers. When the apps are installed, the web browsers will detect the apps and ask if the user wants the app to show up in the browser. If the browser doesn't support the app, then the user interface and features of the software will still work in the browser, but users will not be able to see the toolbars or edit files using web-based tools.
