I just completed a series of images that I intend to print to 16"x20" canvas. I enjoy finding interesting ways to approach the challenge. I find that some of the results with some very good possibilities. The challenge is not so much as choosing the right color to go forward. It is broadening the palette and looking for new avenues to explore. I created some images that have an almost black and white feel. In some cases, I am able to give an image a look with such tonal control while avoiding the usual tonal presets that bring up strong colors in the image. It is a challenge that the computer had to improvise. The colors are more muted. My interest is in formats that bring out the muted colors. Even though the backgrounds are digital, the muted color is an abstract print. The muted tones are one of the factors that need to stand out. I have been playing with this in my Parisienne Series. This is one of the reasons that I wanted to play with the Layers Palette in CS6. My goal has been to make the primary colors of the scene stand out. I hope in the end to find a gallery that not only suits my taste but also works with the other images on my website. The rendering here is "crisper" through out the retouching and the layers. Since this retouching is more subtle than the work I have done in Photoshop, adjusting the saturation has not been done. I keep coming back to editing tools and those hungry, greedy image data files. Everything else in this update is geared towards being more user friendly and smoother in its operation. It is hardly a month since Lightroom 5 was released, however, so we are still taking our first steps to what is a very complex software. The good news is that it is also pretty straightforward, leaving us with no other alternative but to get used to it. For Lightroom users, who have been using Adobe's software since the early days, these are exciting times, not just for the new features, but also for the frequent updates that accompany it. And that, in turn, is one of the perfect examples of how one can expect Lightroom to perform over time. If you follow the upgrade path, you will see how Lightroom enlarges itself during those three years or so, steadily improving. The perfect analogy for this is swim fins. A pair of fins start out with zero support, but each time you use them you grow a little more experienced and can reach greater speeds. If you evolve to a 4 fin set, you can go even faster and make more precise maneuvers. I hope that Lightroom 5 will grow ever stronger for you, the user, and with each new feature on its way you will see how happy it makes you to be more and more productive with it. After all, as I once heard, the best compliments you can receive are from those who ask you for more than you can give.
