Mobilisation and fate of heavy metals in black-chinned tilapia, Oreochromis mossambicus, exposed to lead nitrate. In the present study, black-chinned tilapia, Oreochromis mossambicus, was exposed to lead nitrate to evaluate the mobilization and transport processes of lead in fish. A 95-day experiment was performed to investigate the effects of environmentally realistic concentrations of lead nitrate on the growth, biochemical parameters, and metal distribution in fish tissues. Uptake of lead was assessed using various techniques, i.e. K(+)-selective microelectrodes, conventional electrochemical methods, and inductively coupled plasma mass spectrometry. Significant deleterious effects on the growth, development, and biochemical profile of the fish were observed, associated with a significant reduction in the feed conversion ratio and absolute condition factor during the exposure period. Uptake of lead in gills, gonads, and the liver was significantly (P
