Buy the new Fantasy Adventure game here: Play Fantasy Adventure Game in Google Play: long term goals are to understand how cells activate each other and the mechanisms that disrupt this activation during disease processes. The epidermal growth factor receptor (EGFR) is highly expressed in many human breast cancers, and activation of EGFR by its ligands, EGF and TGF-, has been linked to a series of events that ultimately lead to uncontrolled cell division and tumor formation. EGFR signaling involves the activation of signaling pathways, which include the RAS/RAF/MEK/ERK cascade, the PI3K/Akt pathway and the STAT3 pathway. In contrast to EGFR, the ErbB2 receptor is also highly activated in breast cancer, although in a different subset of tumors, and has been shown to have contrasting relationships with EGFR signaling. As well, the ErbB2 receptor itself activates signaling pathways independent of EGFR, and activates different signaling pathways than EGFR. Therefore, additional to EGFR and ErbB2, there are multiple pathways that are activated in breast cancers. In order to understand how ErbB receptor signaling is initiated and function, we have used biochemical assays and an in vivo cell fate mapping system that permits us to examine the temporal and spatial signaling events that result in ErbB receptor activation. We also examined how these pathways intersect in vivo. Recently, we have examined how a novel ErbB receptor, ErbB3, functions. This receptor has been shown to be activated by the EGFR ligand heregulin (HRG), and activates a proliferation promoting PI3K/Akt pathway. Our initial data showed that ErbB3 alone in mammary epithelia stimulated proliferation and suppress apoptosis, and was needed for normal cell turnover in mammary gland development. In addition, this receptor was also required for the survival of mammary tumors. Mice lacking ErbB3 displayed diminished tumor burden, and did not develop mammary tumors after 12 months. By using gene targeting and conditional knockout of ErbB3 in mammary epithelia we were able to conclude that ErbB
