This invention relates to a dental instrument and particularly to a measurement indicating device which generates a signal in response to the positioning of a tooth. The signals are converted to audible sounds to facilitate, for example, locating the tooth with respect to a dental instrument such as a pick or drill. A procedure for locating and repositioning teeth involves preparing the tooth to receive a restoration, usually by the application of a preparation paste. The tooth is then inspected, particularly to determine where the cutting edges of the drill or pick are with respect to the enamel surface of the tooth to determine that the drilling or picking will not intrude beyond the desired boundary of restoration. For example, when the placement of the restoration is being determined, the drill or pick is moved along the tooth surface from the distal end of the tooth to the proximal end of the tooth and the operator listens to the sounds of the drill as it passes over the tooth surface to obtain an impression of the sound of the drill on the tooth. The operator then determines the point of the sound from the tooth surface that is nearest the point on the tooth where the cutting edge of the drill will first contact the tooth and then moves the drill in a direction and distance that will provide the necessary clearance from the enamel before beginning the drilling. Thus, if the sounds that are produced by the drill are not readily apparent and easily recognized by the operator, the operator may mistakenly position the drill too close to the enamel causing damage to the tooth and/or drill. A variety of dental devices are known in the art for locating and repositioning teeth. For example, reference is made to U.S. Pat. Nos. 3,330,120, 3,434,231, 4,210,035, and 4,287,698. U.S. Pat. No. 3,330,120 discloses a sound generating device for locating teeth. The sound generating device includes a plurality of sound producing elements which extend perpendicular to the line of insertion d0c515b9f4
