The city of Hinamizawa. A small village that is the gateway to Mount Fuji. There are many things here; like a hot spring and a train which runs through here every morning. People come here to enjoy the village life. After all, there are no sights in the country around here. The country is so quiet, it's as if the area was designed for people who are easily depressed. When the history of the village began to be written in the book of history, those who had acted as caretakers had fallen silent. There are the memories of the people who lived in the past, but they are no longer heard. Famous events are of the past. Familiar faces have long been replaced. But even if the village started to disappear from history, it hasn't changed at all for those who live here. The world of the dead isn't where they sleep. It's the village where they're born, the village where they live, and the village that they die. Since it's not a place where people die, there are no traces of death. And not just that, but it's a place where time and distance are unnecessary. If you want to go to a place that is so safe that you feel that you can't die, it's the place where everyone who has died is living. Who would want to visit that kind of place? The people who have the right to enter this village, and those who have the right to leave it. No matter how quiet they are, this is the village where everyone who has died is living. in Front of the Middle Cut... Flee the scene, luv. Shoo off, are yer! I whipped round. She'd found a rusty nail, dragged it out of the wood and dropped it in the grass between us. Well that was a bit of an enormous middle finger... and it was the middle finger, not the left. She had four of them, asymmetrical even. An old Danish Christian fundamentalist from the seventies, colourfully bearded and tattooed, stood over us. 'Good evening. It's time to move on, you lot. Put your feet up out of those damn boats and let the show continue.' People had drawn coffee from a roadside stand. We removed our feet, leaving red footprints. 'You're breaking the law there, love. They are stands. Not moveable. Can't last long like that.' Rachel and Tim had vanished. 'Come off it, mate, you're not a cop. Are you even a British citizen? Or simply one of the scum? We'd better move again, pronto. There are the islands off shore. It'll be good to stretch your legs, that's all I'm saying.' He put his foot back in. 'Put your hands in your pockets. It'll save you getting that cut.' He jerked his finger out of his cheek. 'The last one out, the first one in. Out you get.' Two or three pieces of flintstone had poked through the fabric and wood of the pontoons. Big Whitey took one or two out, pocketed them and we followed him a bit further up the beach. 'Now, there's a picture you won't want tucked away in yer gut.' He inspected the undercarriage of a yellow speedboat. It was a Honda. 'That's probably a LiSly, they love them back at home. Won't get three hundred miles out of it, but they're great for fishing. Whitewash the top and sometimes there's more solids underneath.' The man spoke English with a local accent, or it was all he recognised. A busker played a Yamaha piano. 'On the other side of the island there's a caravan and a van. Plenty of space. Maintain a distance. They'll spot anyone land walking.' We moved further
