zhou, xiaochun ( ). [elementary chinese]. henan: henan normal university press, 2015. this textbook is similar to the textbook mentioned above. this textbook covers the first three lessons of the main textbook, integrated chinese, level 1, and part 1(4th edition, simplified characters). the textbook includes the essential vocabulary and grammar for oral and written communication, practice in writing chinese characters, exploring aspects of chinese culture and society, making comparisons between the chinese language and culture, and authentic text or audio, visual materials are used to enhance development of communication skills. kroeber, a. l., and c. kluckhohn (eds.). [a culture and its psychology: a spoken language book]. new york: wiley, 1947. this book is a collection of articles about a variety of topics in the field of the psychology of language. it is highly recommended for its use in helping students approach the grammar of complex sentences. the book is very helpful in one sense and not in another. it is very helpful in that it introduces students to the concepts that are covered in chapter one. however, it is not a very helpful text in that it does not introduce students to the grammar of questions or negatives. it does not even introduce students to any grammar of questions or negatives. i think that students need a text that treats both the grammar of questions and negatives as well as the grammar of complex sentences. wong, carolyn (). [chinese grammar: a user's guide to roles, gender, and number.] cambridge, ma: the mit press, 2004. this book is geared for a general audience. as the title states, this book is for students who want to learn basic grammar. the book is not very helpful in that it does not teach the grammar of questions or negatives. students need a book that covers the basic grammar of questions and negatives as well as the grammar of complex sentences.
