The present invention relates to the field of electrical connectors for securing fiber optic cable to an electrical device. The present invention relates generally to the interconnection of an optical fiber to a device utilizing an optical connector. More particularly, the invention relates to an apparatus and method for securing an optical fiber connector to a device. In the telecommunications industry, optical fibers are often used to transmit telecommunications signals. The telecommunications signal is carried by the light energy traveling through the fiber.

Each fiber usually carries several light waves that form a signal. The optical signals are often carried from the fiber to devices that transform the optical signals to electrical signals. The devices that perform the transformation of optical signals to electrical signals are often called optical transceivers. A common method for coupling the optical fiber to the optical transceiver is to secure the optical connector to the device by bending the small end of the optical connector against a hole in the device. The hole is often located behind a faceplate that protects the device from damage. The small end of the connector is sized to fit into the hole. In this manner, the small end of the connector often snaps into position into the hole so that it does not come out of the hole. However, this method of securing an optical connector often presents problems. For example, the optical connector is often inadvertently damaged during a manufacturing step and the small end of the connector comes out of the hole. Further, the small end of the connector is easily damaged during shipping and handling of the optical transceiver. Accordingly, it is important to secure the optical connector to the device so that the small end of the connector does not come out of the hole. The present invention provides a method and apparatus for securing an optical fiber connector to a device. The method comprises the steps of providing an aperture in a device and forming a hole through the aperture. The method further comprises forming a receiving cavity in the device and securing an optical connector to the receiving cavity. In the present invention, the method of securing the optical connector further comprises the steps of providing a retaining device having at least one protrusion, inserting the protrusion into the receiving cavity to form a locking mechanism, and securing the optical connector to the receiving cavity by positioning the optical connector against
