To find out exactly how HyperMotion Technology works, we talked to, you guessed it, Dr. Randy Pitchford. Pitchford is Lead Producer on the upcoming football title, and he explains how HyperMotion Technology will improve player performance, make gameplay more accessible for younger players and much more. Console players can look forward to a major gameplay overhaul in FIFA 22. For the first time in the history of the series, the game will feature the brand new "Skill Stick". The skill stick allows players to perform all actions in the football game using shortcuts from the in-game menus rather than swiping on the touchscreen. This replaces the old "popping" system, and it's been completely removed entirely from FIFA Ultimate Team. Additionally, console players should be happy to hear that you will be able to use "slide tackle," and other similar "physics" based tackling moves. These are very popular in other football games, and you will be able to use them in FIFA 22 without having to change your default tackling style. Both console and PC players are familiar with the "one touch" method of controlling a player's run. The new motion control system allows you to easily add or remove controls in a more intuitive manner. This makes the system much more accessible to new players, and allows more professional players to use more advanced skills with ease. Dr. Pitchford also took a moment to explain that the new "visual autosave feature" allows you to save your progress without interrupting gameplay. This was a key feature requested by people who play online. Finally, Pitchford discussed the new camera control system, which allows you to move the camera in a very intuitive manner. The new accessibility features aren't just exclusive to players with disabilities. "I'm really proud of how we're addressing accessibility in FIFA 22. It's something that I think is very much underserved in football games." To address the issue, many teams will be able to play with virtual assistants in FIFA 22. Team mates that are able to assist in game will be featured in the career mode. For example, one assistant can collect the ball for a player, or provide them with a sprint button for half a second. This allows players to lead their team in all areas of the game
