User reviews Amazon.co.uk review review - Instant download Posted by DoctorD on 29th Mar 2008 It's simple to use. When using, I was simply amazed with the ease with which I could backup my all my cookies and all of my browsing history. The other awesome thing was the self-explanatory installer. I could not find anything that I did not like about this great tool. Highly recommend this product. Amazon.com review - Very helpful: Best way to backup your history Posted by mutc on 19th Apr 2004 Very practical for a computer newbie. Even if you have used older techniques, or if you are transitioning from one version of Internet Explorer to another, this will be a big help. The software gives you the opportunity to save important data after backing up your preferences. the three-dimensional volume of the coronary artery. Angiography has been used to assess coronary artery anatomy in relation to in-stent restenosis or calcification. For a long time, the shape of the coronary arteries has been used to predict the risk of future heart attack or death due to coronary artery disease. In one study, almost one third of the variability in the coronary occlusion rate was associated with differences in the ostium shape. The volume of the coronary arteries was not a significant independent predictor in that study, because its coefficient of variation was only 6.2%. Currently, in the United States, the National Heart, Lung and Blood Institute's Framingham Heart Study has yielded a first set of equations for a variety of pathologies, especially high blood pressure and the risk of strokes. In 2006 the Framingham Heart Study created a fourth version of their equations. The Framingham Heart Study found that the higher the BP, the smaller the arterial diameters. The Framingham study showed that with age, more and larger arterial calcification occurs, as well as a greater risk of heart attacks and strokes. The Takayasu arteritis study from Japan examined 20 patients with Takayasu's arteritis. Sub-millimeter cine angiography was performed with a single volume of acquisition and 1.0 millimeter thick slices. The ultrasonography of each patient was examined to determine the ankle

The HER2 protein is overexpressed in several cancers, including breast cancer, and is associated with poor clinical outcomes. Patients with HER2-positive breast cancer are treated with a combination of anti-HER2 agents (such as trastuzumab, pertuzumab, and trastuzumab-emtansine). Monitoring of HER2 expression by immunohistochemistry (IHC) or fluorescence in situ hybridization (FISH) has been implemented as part of clinical practice to help identify those patients who may benefit from anti-HER2 treatment. However, detection of HER2 amplification in tumor cells may be limited by the lack of metastases biopsies of some patients, or by the presence of non-tumoral cells. The detection of HER2 expression/amplification by IHC and/or FISH in tumor-adjacent lymphocytes in breast cancer patients has been considered relevant as it seems to be associated with better outcome in these patients. In this paper, we aimed to assess HER2 expression in tumor-adjacent lymphocytes by IHC in Mexican patients and correlate the results to the presence of HER2 amplification by FISH. Thirty-three breast cancer patients with known HER2 status in tumor cells by FISH were included. All of them underwent tumor-adjacent lymphocytes biopsy and the samples were histologically evaluated for their presence and the co-localization of HER2 expression by immunohistochemistry and HER2 amplification by FISH, as detected by the PathVysion® kit. HER2 was detected in 27 (82%) of the 33 patients. HER2 expression in tumor-adjacent lymphocytes was detected in 13 (39%) of the patients, and in only 7 of them (64%) FISH detected HER2 amplification in tumor-adjacent lymphocytes. Seven HER2-
