A documentary film about the Piraña Conspiracy, the meeting point between the local activists and the Spanish ETA group. The documentary begins with the founding of the group and their first actions: graffiti, burning tires, and creating a siege to the police station and the army barracks. After a four-year search the group meets its contacts and faces their first real tests. Don't let their striking appearance fool you. They're really just normal kids who were led astray by their friend, Captain Abril. They're joined by friends and various other children who are told that in order to be accepted by their new friends, they must follow their strict orders. But their new friends aren't really trying to change the children or make them into killers. They're just teaching the children how to kill. One part of this is a course in throwing Molotov cocktails. There's also a very quick tutorial on how to survive the fire and flame. The documentary shows the children as they act out how they behave and speak when they're in the process of learning to kill. The kids quickly learn the best ways to throw Molotov cocktails at the government soldiers that are trying to capture them. And in f988f36e3a
