But the truth is that Clinton's campaign made her losing position worse by consistently offering up a confused message and by failing to have an authentic, unscripted and empowering message of her own. The campaign's strategy seemed at times to be to highlight the narrow margin of Clinton's victory to suggest that the outcome was somehow illegitimate. But the way the election was won was clear to anyone who watched the campaign unfold—Clinton won because she could rely on a massive turnout of women and college students in key states, who had been energized by the #MeToo movement and supported Clinton's hard-left platform. This was not a win that was earned on merit; it was not a win that was even necessary. Clinton's main message of promoting the success of her gender was that she was a girl who grew up in rural Arkansas and went to college on the state's dime, overcoming obstacles like flagrantly sexist treatment from her future husband and a family that could barely afford to put food on the table. The couple's 10-year marriage was a testament to her determination to overcome crushing obstacles. And she always seemed to cast herself as both a mother and a feminist at the same time. It's true that a lot of women felt empowered by Clinton's lifestyle story; in fact, I know that some women with conservative views felt particularly inspired by her example. Yet while it is important to empower
