The city is proposing to increase the city's operational tax on rideshare services from 1 percent to 3 percent. The additional tax revenue would go to a fund which would then be used for "significantly increasing [transportation] improvements on Seattle's streets." Though Seattle's proposed increase in rideshare taxes may sound like a step in the right direction, city councilman Mike O'Brien is struggling to see the payoff for residents. He states, "taxes on ridesharing services could be coming out of our pockets in a way that the city doesn't want." O'Brien points out that despite Seattle's efforts to promote the rideshare services, they are still in need of more funding. "Why are we being asked to pick up the tax bill? What is the rationale for asking the city to come up with $3 million in revenue?" O'Brien questions. In 2010, Seattle's City Council passed a bill which would require residents to have a transit account in order to receive rebates. Because of issues in compliance, the program is currently suspended. Cristina Short, a communications officer for Seattle's Department of Transportation, says, "the city is still in the works of re-evaluating and refining ways to make the program work better." Though O'Brien believes that the city's proposal of a new rideshare tax would benefit the city's residents, he thinks that there are better ways to invest the city's tax dollars. He states,
