last month, i took a trip to the farmstand. im headed there next week, and i want to take pictures of the new way we are doing it. its also an opportunity to educate people on the changes that are happening. i want to show people that we arent just a pile of produce. what the farmstand represents is a movement for others to join us, because if we can accomplish anything in this moment, it will be to create a new future for our food system, where everyone has access to healthy food that is affordable. on friday, we did a potluck with people who had been out of work at that time. we ended up buying a bunch of stuff from radical family farms, a queer asian-owned farm in Sebastopol. we used this abundance of food to get to know each other and have a feast. i started thinking about how we're having a feast when we're all out of work and how that's not something that's going to last. i thought that maybe one way to do that is to do a pop-up for just a few days and do it by myself. we've done other pop-ups at people's houses, but they're usually for a few days. i started asking around and found a place at a farm in the south bay, and the place has been empty for a while. the owner put me in touch with farmers from California living organics, who live in the bay area and are working with the farmers at the farm and the farm workers. they're a south asian farming collective that's been doing this work for 30 years. the goal is to open up this place for people who are out of work. for the last month, we've been paying the farm workers and the farm workers have been helping us. our goal is to make sure everyone is paid by the end of this month. we're doing this because we believe that there are a lot of undocumented people who are working in this industry, so its important that everyone gets paid.

mickael, volumental, oyster mushroom tea- this was the first one in our series. we all agree on this one. its iconic. everyone here loves it. when i was sampling cheese bread and strawberry jam, i was like, okay, this is another one of those things people had to learn about. i havent gotten any backlash about it. and to be honest, ive been sampling it for eight weeks, so people had time to get used to it. there is definitely a wider range of questions on the menus, where a lot of our crowd are open to trying new things but not always able to follow an entire food journey from recipe to food, but this is the one they're talking about. we really didn't ask if they liked it or not. we asked if they enjoyed the experience of trying it. and the most important question was when are you going to make one again? we have prepared for flu season for four years, and we have had vaccine shortages each year, so we thought we had a nice mix of products. however, the vaccine timing is perfect to buy our produce for year-round availability. with the flu vaccine shortage, we have shifted toward preparing for the worst scenario, stocking up on everything we can, and being prepared for staying home for 2 weeks or more. we have started to start handing out masks, and have been distributing cleaning supplies and cleaning wipes to those who have asked. although we have had a warmer and more humid fall in comparison to past years, i have been happy with our autumn sales and so far they have been strong. while we try to offer local organic/local non-organic options, it is harder to offer this in our production-driven model, where we have to sell to demand. we want to get to the point where we can offer products in more product options: more breads, more meat. while we will continue to work with our off-site farmers, and focus on our own operation for the next year, i am excited to take on new initiatives and partnerships, and to build on what we are doing. 5ec8ef588b
