if you want to build apps for other platforms, you have the following options: build a.net core pcl app for windows, linux, macos, and android, but your code can't run on these platforms. build a.net core pcl app for windows, linux, macos, and ios, but your code can only run on windows and ios. i agree.

also why not make it a 5.0 core target it still will be the first major release, first beta then stable and after two years the first lts version. but the problem was the law, microsoft wanted the system.threading.tasks libraries to be part of core, not only the async/await keywords. with.net core, you can start building c# apps for linux now. we've also built many windows apps on.net core and added more windows targets for both windows and linux. i'm hearing there's a bunch of work to port mono to.net core. so here's some lessons learned in.net core cross-platform development. the.net core sdk delivers everything you need to build.net core apps in one package. you can deploy your app to windows, linux, macos, android, ios, and others. only a full sdk delivers the full toolchain, so the.net core tools are only available when you build your own toolchain. today, the accessibility of office's unique features is a big concern for many people on the windows platform. office on windows requires windows components such as windows explorer and windows shell to be running in the background to provide visual cues to the user and to allow access to keyboard, mouse and other input devices. this relationship between office and windows system components was originally designed to ensure that office was not blocked from accessing and supporting user windows functions, but in recent releases, microsoft has been having difficulty testing this relationship to ensure that the behavior of the two is still intact. 5ec8ef588b
