of Kashan, south of the capital Tehran, convicted 25 people, including the director of the Cultural Policies of the Foreign Ministry and the head of cultural policies for the provinces, of "taking part in the production of explosives," the US State Department said on Monday. The explosion, which also injured several others, damaged the car of a television journalist in the city of Kashan. According to the US, the explosion was carried out by a group of young men affiliated to a "terrorist organization" and linked to "anti-Iranian propaganda." "This is a further step toward the killing of Iranian civilians, and we strongly condemn their actions and call on the Iranian authorities to end the violations of basic human rights and to investigate them," the US state department said. "The acts perpetrated by these individuals are part of an organized plan by Iranian authorities to silence the people who are struggling for their basic human rights and to intimidate Iranian bloggers and journalists who are critical of the Iranian government," it said.

Kashan was the scene of a deadly blast on January 27, 2011. Another explosion on July 8, 2018, in the country killed 28 people and wounded more than 200 others. The Foreign Ministry's Committee for Cultural Policy was named as a "designated terrorist organization" by the State Department on April 7, 2012. Amid rising anti-Iranian sentiments in the United States, particularly after former Republican presidential candidate Donald Trump's comments
