"Concussion Reform 360" "The Fumble" This online experience from the FIFA video game series features a team of star players from the Stanford football team, including All-American running back Bryce Love, along with Stanford Captains Alameen Murphy, JJ Arcega-Whiteside, Brandon Simmons, and wide-receiver Trenton Irwin. On April 15, a high school football game was played between Bryce and JJ's school, Mira High School, in the San Fernando Valley. Together, they educate students about concussions and the best strategies to prevent and treat concussions in order to make the game safer. Video production and animation were captured in 360°, so it feels as if you are sitting on the ground next to the players. Video, animations, text, and graphics were created specifically for this format. Additional videos, animations, text, and graphics were created specifically for this medium using the latest version of our production pipeline. "Thoroughly vetted by leading subject matter experts," the education content in this 360° animation was reviewed by the following subject matter experts: * Sports Medicine Physician and Professor at Stanford University School of Medicine, Zachary Lieberman, M.D., Ph.D. * Center Director of the Sports Medicine Program at Stanford University School of Medicine, Professor Peter Lagerstrom, M.D. * Associate Dean for Clinical Education and Student Success at Stanford University School of Medicine, Associate Professor Sophia Arrington-Ryan, M.D., M.P.H. * Associate Dean for Medical Education at Stanford University School of Medicine, Professor Joseph O. This reality show, hosted by actor Scott Baio, premiered on September 2, 1987, and ran for one season. The contestants were real people playing pranks on fellow contestants and experts in a series of competitions to see who would win the grand prize of a year's free rent. The show's only continuing legacy was its catch phrase, coined by the pilot and played up on the program's closing credits: "The beginning of the end." The original series was shot in Chicago, Illinois, and was co-produced by

Fred Silverman, Mark Goodson & Bill Todman. The producers created the show with assistance from William R. Castle, and it was filmed by Gary and Neon Versa We're always looking for new ways to stay lean and strong. Plain and simple. We've got the tools on this blog to get you over the hurdles, but the only tool you need is YOURSELF. We started the Focus Series after reading through one of our older posts and found an opportunity to tell you more about these small, yet effective, tools so that you could have a better understanding of why they matter so much to you. Ready? We are. But first, we need a little history. Having struggled with weight for most of my adult life, I was always one of those kids that didn't want to get big, but I also didn't want to be the anorexic girl either. I was always becoming heavier, but you couldn't tell by looking at me. I was always getting into a great shape, had killer abs and when I wasn't running or fishing, I was biking. But it made no sense, I just couldn't figure it out. And then I started lifting weights, and I was hitting a whole new level of fitness, way better than I ever was. And I was stuck. I started having more and more feelings of loneliness, while at the same time, any time I went somewhere with other women, I could never catch up. I always struggled to keep the social juice flowing, and never seemed to be able to find anyone that enjoyed talking as much as I did. My exercise levels actually got higher and higher, as I was leaning more and more on that strength aspect to tone up. I even spoke to my doctor to see if there were any side-effects in terms of my hormones. Those showed that everything was pretty on-point. I just couldn't find the common connection with other people that I once had without end. It was a bit bewildering. Want to know how I truly dealt with it? Read on. I opened my eyes with the idea that I was somehow fat. I would always tell myself, "You're so fat," and "You're always so fat," or "You're so big," and, "Oh, you're so fat," as I walked through the snow. I wasn't eating on a regular basis at all, so that was one reason for my weight gain.
