A: Use this regex DEMO Q: Euclidean Algorithm - Proving that the algorithm terminates I am having a problem with the following question: Prove that the Euclidean Algorithm always terminates. I am asking how do I prove that the algorithm terminates? I know that that $a_1 = 1$ and $a_2 = b_1$ and $b_2 = 1$ this is the basis of the algorithm, but I have no idea how to prove that the algorithm will terminate. I also know that: $b_1 \wedge a_1 \wedge b_2 \wedge a_2$ A: The Euclidean algorithm is based on the fact that $\text{lcm}(a,b) = a \cdot \text{gcd}(k+r, b) = k+r \cdot \text{lcm}(a, b)$ for any k, r in \mathbb{Z} . Does it sound scary? Perhaps it is but I'm over the moon about the opportunity! I'm hoping to have the game ready for us by 12, so anyone around at this time who would like to join us should pop into Ikea Fitzroy, 101 Swindon Street, and wait for me. I'll let you know when its my turn to run the game so that it's easier for those who don't want to be in a hurry. If there's interest, I'll write a whole post on the venue and what you can expect. The term is used to differentiate the load from the actual load on the cabin, which can be an extreme value in some failure cases. In plain English, the proportional constant load (PCL) is a proportion of the average cable force that the cord mechanism should apply. The PCL can be determined using the following formula: where: Fc is the cable load value of the cable mechanism Fa is the average value of the force applied to a car during normal operation DC is the rating of the cable mechanism (The term "normal operation" is used to distinguish it from "operative" or "under operating" tension of the cable, which would usually be the case at the end of a normal operating day or an emergency situation.) Because the rating is a static value, this does not take into account the losses due to fatigue, which make the cable break. The PCL also does not take into account the fact that the force applied to the car is not constant, but actually increases during operation. This can be corrected by the industry-standard method of determining the end-of-day cable force—called "operating hours" or "o-h". When this is done, the average cable force over the day is calculated and the PCL is determined.
