Residual stress distribution in the vertebral body and posterior part of the spinal canal after a transpedicular fixation of the unstable fracture of the vertebral body. A biomechanical study. Stress patterns of vertebral body and posterior part of the spinal canal in four canine vertebral bodies after a transpedicular fixation of the unstable fracture of the vertebral body. To quantify the residual stress distribution of the vertebral body and posterior part of the spinal canal after a transpedicular fixation of the unstable fracture of the vertebral body. Several reports have demonstrated that the risk of adjacent segment disease, including nonunion, kyphosis, and neurological deficits, after posterior surgery increases when posterior instrumentation is applied to the patient with lumbar canal stenosis, kyphosis, or instability. The residual stress at the fixation site after a transpedicular fixation of the unstable fracture of the vertebral body and the spread of the stress into the adjacent segments should be evaluated. Eight cadaveric canine vertebral bodies were used to fixate the complete fracture of the vertebral body in all vertebral bodies. Six months after the fixation, the residual stress distribution of the vertebral body and the posterior part of the spinal canal was measured after the pedicle screw withdrawal and measured under a four-point bending in flexion-extension and left and right lateral bending. The stress distribution in the vertebral body and posterior part of the spinal canal during the axial rotation was then measured after the simulation of the movement and reference neutral position. The anterior part of the vertebral body showed the highest stress during axial rotation after the screw withdrawal. It was also observed that the stress was asymmetrical in the posterior part of the spinal canal in axial rotation after the fixation. The difference of the residual stresses in the vertebral body and posterior part of the spinal canal was observed and the difference of the stress was increased in the posterior part of the spinal canal in axial rotation after the fixation. The fixation of the unstable fracture of the vertebral body caused asymmetrical residual stresses in the vertebral body and posterior part of the spinal canal. Additionally, the stress in the posterior part of the spinal canal became higher when the posterior instrumentation was applied to the patient with lumbar canal stenosis, kyphosis, or instability. It was suggested that careful consideration of the patient's situation, especially the lumbar canal stenosis, kyphosis, and instability, is required when the posterior instrumentation is
