The Hidden Brain of Social Media – How Facebook Manipulates Us & Cues Us To Click
The Hidden Brain of Social Media – How Facebook Manipulates Us & Cues Us To Click On your news feed, you're seeing the friends who matter to you and your friends are the ones who matter to you. Facebook is displaying what it thinks are the the most important people to you. The social media giant hopes your mind fills in the rest of the gap – the missing image. And they can make a very convincing case. Who are you? In many ways, your profile represents you. Your background, your photos, your interests. In a way, it's your first impression. And your friends will judge you by your friends. What are they doing? Are they happy? Are they offering help? On Facebook, you will soon be able to see, depending on your settings, a static timeline of your friends' lives — say, for a month. But in the timeline, your friends' postings will not begin until a given point in time, along with their timing. So, your friends' timelines are frozen in place from a time when you had not yet set your timeline to "going." Their postings will display at the date and time you want them to, and, all at once, they will appear to you as if they're speaking to you. And I think, Facebook will have a very convincing case that it's them speaking to you: What friends to you care about, don't change much, so their postings will appear to be consistent with their personality. Which is lovely for their reaction, but for you it's confusing: It's a different context than you're used to. Even if you know a friend's personality well, he or she is acting differently than he or she normally does. The thought of it may disturb you, in part because you've become accustomed to your profile being a window into your mind. It is unsettling. It's as if your Facebook has become your window into society and, in a way, of your friends' lives and your life. On your news feed, you're seeing your friends' lives and what they're doing: joy, fame, misfortune, love, anger. Your social network has become, in a sense, a window into society.
