What's new:

's Quarter_, for which he was charged £50, and was sent to Newgate in consequence. About the year 1797, he was again in custody, for forging a bankbill for the amount of £120, to pay his sureties, with the further impropriety of abandoning his defence in the King's Bench, and remaining on the Continent for several years. He was at last brought to trial on 29th of June, 1799, and was found guilty of being entrusted with the bankbill, "without the King's express or assent." He received sentence of death, and was transported to New South Wales, to be conveyed from thence to Van Dieman's Land, "for the good of all parties." In the Act for establishing and regulating the Colony of Van Dieman's Land, there is a proviso, page 446, Thirteenth Section, "That where any person, by false pretences, designed to deceive the public or the King's Government, receives pay or else comforts or presents, with the view of procuring his trepanation or his being transported or transported for trepanation, he shall be punished with transportation for five years hard labour." "Captain Smith, of the Botany Bay Settlement," Mr. Marsden says in his Pioneer Life, p. 582, "was an impostor." He prevaricated with the Governor of New South Wales, who became very suspicious of his behaviour, and sent him as a spy to New Holland, where he obtained a situation in Government, and introduced many persons into the country under a false name. No one in authority had the least suspicion that the representative of Government was travestied and ruined. Smith, doubly an impostor, a liar and a robber, was the most ardent advocate of a fraudulent colony. [8] [9] As to the religious state of the Colony at that time, Mr. Marsden adduces the following item:— "July 14th, 1799.—Sir Benjamin D'Arcy ordered that the soldiers at the Government House, never before had their pay in full but by receiving the forgiveness of all their sins by receiving the Holy Sacrament on Sabbath days; and on that day they never had it but the chaplain

Id. 579 N.Y.S.2d at 464. The court also explained that the phrase "prosecutor of the court" in CPL 1.20(24) was intended to "allow[] the court itself to question the attorney, and be free from the control of the attorney in this matter." Id. In CPL 1.20(24), the judge decides the materiality and admissibility of evidence and the final resolution of factual issues. Here, however, the prosecutor has decided both the issues of evidence and final fact. The judge in this case assigned the case to a magistrate to decide the pre-trial motions, and when he turned to the prosecutor to determine the admissibility of the evidence of Ms. Daehler's mental condition, the prosecutor *398 exercised independent judgment regarding whether evidence of Ms. Daehler's mental condition was relevant to the issues. Further, this Court has held that prosecutors should be allowed to make the decision regarding whether to prosecute a case. State v. Bell, 128 N
