The present invention relates generally to rotary printing machines and in particular to an improved method and apparatus for directing sheets to be printed within a printing machine. Rotary printing machines, such as flexographic printing machines, use raised image areas known as relief plates to print a desired image on a printing plate or on a sheet of paper or other suitable medium. The relief plates are mounted on a printing plate cylinder or on a rotating drum. The raised image areas are created in the relief plate by controlling the pressure of an ink-attenuated fountain solution applied to the plate surface by one or more fountain rollers. After the fountain rollers apply the ink-attenuated fountain solution to the plate surface, a sheet of paper or other medium is pressed against the fountain-wetted surface. The ink is then transferred to the Distribution of nickel, copper, zinc, and cadmium in sediment and fish from a nickel-copper sulfate plant. Sediment and fish samples were collected from the Upper and Lower Chippewa Lakes in Duluth, Minnesota, and the Lake of the Woods near the Cargill Industrial Park. Water, sediment, and fish concentrations of nickel, copper, cadmium, and zinc were measured. Concentrations of nickel, copper, and zinc in the water, sediment, and fish were found to be low. The highest concentration of cadmium (1.83 micrograms/g dry weight) was found in the sediment of the Lower Chippewa, where there was a sulfate mine. Fish from the Upper Chippewa contained cadmium concentrations two- to threefold that of fish from the lower lake. Because the Upper Chippewa is adjacent to a nickel-copper sulfate plant, these high concentrations of cadmium in fish and sediment near the plant may be the result of exposure to aerial contaminants. {"name": "inflight", "description": "Add callbacks to request the cancellation of an in flight request", "version": "1.0.6", "author": {"name": "Einar Otto Stangvik", "email": "einaros@gmail.com", "url": ""}, "license": "MIT", "repository": {"type": "git", "url": "git+" },
