I know the data can be retrieved through the indexed view, but this operation needs to be completely under control of the developer, so that is not an option. The goal is to have an organized log of this operation that can be downloaded and used to make sure that all records were loaded properly into the indexed view. My thought was to set up a query on the indexed view that will retrieve all records out of the indexed view and then, after a bit of checking, add them to a table. This approach ensures that all records exist and the indexed view is loaded, but I do not know of any approach to getting the right number of records. All records that are not in this log will be removed from the indexed view or not inserted into the log. I am also open to other suggestions. A: Is it possible to create a stored procedure that will check the integrity of an indexed view? No, it's not possible. If the view was indexed, then your procedure will process the only row in the view, and that's the only thing that is going to be generated. The
