Chinese sponges, Haliclona (Tethya) caerulea (Order Haplosclerida; Family Halichondriidae) and C. (Haliclona) dianae (Order Halichondriidae; Family Halichondriidae) are acknowledged as a valuable aquaculture resource for the supply of halogenated compounds, including mollusk-derived toxins, with commercial importance in food and pharmaceutical areas. Oxylipins are a class of bioactive lipids that are produced by plants and marine algae. Our aim was to investigate the presence and abundance of oxylipins in Chinese sponges, and explore their impacts on the growth of larvicidal activities of cyprids. Distinctive oxylipin profiles were found in the two sponges with the halogenated fatty acids as the major components, providing further support that they are derived from photosynthetic microalgae. The toxic nature of Chinese sponges was also demonstrated via the significant growth inhibition of zebrafish larvae. Furthermore, the present results revealed that the Chinese sponge-derived oxylipins could be used to control mollusk cephalopods and that C. caerulea possesses higher larvicidal activity. In addition, the fact that more than one oxylipin was found in Chinese sub
