It's real. And it's happening right now. A company is working on a software that can be applied to regular Twitter accounts to increase the "confidence" of messages and, as a result, increasing the likelihood of those messages being retweeted by users. "This is a mission statement for your first tweet," writes the company, called Vext, in an email to The Associated Press. It's not the first program like this, but it represents a step in what could be the next great leap in social media.
