Common gene polymorphisms in drug metabolism enzymes influence the efficacy of antitubercular agents. Tuberculosis (TB), caused by Mycobacterium tuberculosis, is one of the most prevalent causes of death among human immunodeficiency virus (HIV)-infected and non-HIV-infected individuals and leads to an estimated 7 million deaths per year. The emergence of drug-resistant strains of the bacterium worldwide has underscored the need to develop effective drugs against this disease. The efficacy of rifampicin, isoniazid, and pyrazinamide is diminished by polymorphisms in genes involved in drug metabolism. The influence of such gene polymorphisms on treatment response to anti-TB drugs remains controversial. We performed a comprehensive meta-analysis to assess the correlation between the presence or absence of common mutations in genes encoding drug-metabolizing enzymes and the efficacy of the drugs used against M. tuberculosis.
