During the course of neurulation, cephalic mesenchyme of mouse embryos develops into frontal, nasal, and maxillary processes. It was hypothesized that neural crest cells participate in the initiation and maintenance of these processes. A series of experiments using 5-hydroxytryptamine (5-HT) immunostaining and homotypic grafts indicated that processes of the 5-HT-deficient mouse embryo are underdeveloped as compared with the 5-HT-positive control. Moreover, a treatment of 5-HT-deficient mouse embryos with 5-HT during their migration might not alter their phenotype. On the other hand, the results of heterotypic grafts revealed that neural crest cells migrate to the ectoderm in the mesenchymal region as expected. On the basis of these findings, it was suggested that a serotonin deficiency causes an abnormal development of the neural crest cells at the migratory stage and that the abnormalities are responsible for the defective development of the ectodermal structures.Q: How to check if an Activity is finishing or "onPause"? I have an Activity which implements a "my own CountdownTimer". This class holds a member int TimeCounter which indicates how many seconds till the Activity finishes. Now in the activity's onPause (or onStop) method I have to decrement the counter until it equals 0. After that the Activity finishes. The problem is that in ActivityA is calling ActivityB, which is also the action handler of a ImageButton, if I hit

Apparently, the post was also posted on the latter site (through an answer to a different question) before I had checked the first site. This is the link to the post on the second site: Whereas this is the link to the post on the first site: Are these posts considered cross-postings? If so, should the author of the post be credited for the post on the second site or not? A: They are not considered a cross posting. The primary site determines the ownership of the post and whether or not to credit the author. This is true even if you posted on another site and provided no link or credit. See this meta post which gives guidance on how to handle these situations. A: I've found this question quite interesting, and answered it myself in the old SO. The top answer suggests that, if you link the two posts, you should omit the author credit, and the reason it can work, is that "look at this nice link I made, I provided you with the courtesy of notifying you that I did this", and that is an "annoyance", while author credit itself is just a fact. The comment on the top answer also offers a version with authors link, and that can be nice for getting the author's "thanks" or congratulations, but it can be annoying for new SO users, who may not read the comments on the linked page. Personally, I'd suggest not to provide any link. Once a user sees that it's a crosspost, they will probably know that it's a duplicate, and will probably also notice that the answers don't contain author credit, but only other links.
