the m-mail system is a scalable and interactive mail system that is designed to be used by groups of users (multiple administrators) that can manage email for multiple sites. it has a user interface similar to webmail, allowing users to manage mail accounts and receive and send email from multiple mailboxes, with support for multiple types of mail accounts (such as pop3, imap4, nntp, and local mailboxes). m-mail is a free software project developed by the fft community. this needs to be done manually because the mail server exim4 has been configured to not send email for a certain user until it receives a full set of keys. this is to avoid s/mime signing of mail for a user without the necessary keys; this behavior is required by the security standard. imap has also been used with great success in internal networks that do not have a direct connection to the internet. for example, a large company might set up an internal network that only connects to the internet through a web page and a ppp dial-up connection. the company then has a mail server that runs imap on a private network that receives all the company's email messages. here, the pop3 protocol is used in a similar way to pop, but takes advantage of the fact that email messages are delivered to mail servers at regular intervals. messages are delivered at the same interval as when they are received by the mail server, rather than waiting for a fixed length of time. this protocol also works well for users who have a persistent connection to the internet or the network containing the mail server.
