Automated neural network technology is used in the automated inspection of wafers in semiconductor manufacturing. However, using this technology to inspect the more important and more expensive end product--the microchip--is fraught with difficulty. The reasons for this are many, but two of the major ones are the need for a ground truth base and the need for compactness of an end product inspection system. The Intel Corporation has the largest 3-D solid-state image processing system in the world and is continually upgrading that system. The system uses a multi-line linear array of 3920 image-capturing and processing pixels. The system must handle an image that is four million pixels wide by four million pixels high.
