
Bleach Mayuri 5.7 Play

stands for "synchronization" in Japanese, and plays during the fights between Ichigo and his opponents after he's been injured. The song's use in the anime is arguably the most important part of the series, since it was the first time Ichigo had been truly hurt, and by extension, had been forced to draw out his full strength. In the manga, it's his first fight against Kenpachi Zaraki. It's the moment that first reveals the depth of Ichigo's power. Kuchiki Rukia's rock music plays when she's fighting against Urahara during his fight against Aizen. It's a sort of victory song that expresses the strength and determination that each fighter has to endure such a battle. In the anime, it's also the same song that plays during the fight between Rukia and Aizen, despite the fact that it's been around for six years by that point. It's a recurring theme in the Bleach series. A fast-paced battle song that plays during Ichigo and Shunsui's first fight against Aizen. It's all about Ichigo's overconfidence in his own abilities, his determination to win and fight regardless of his injury. It's also the first time that Ichigo ever gets to fight against someone with more experience and power than him, something that helps him to realize that he needs to learn how to fight. Played when Ichigo and Shunsui fight against Aizen for the first time. It was the first time they met, Ichigo was injured, and he didn't trust himself to fight, which he tried to get over by fighting with a renewed determination. another theme in this fight is the contrast between their powers, since although aizen has the strongest and more experienced bankai, he couldn't even beat shunsui's. this song shows just how strong and powerful ichigo and shunsui really are, and how strong their friendship is.
