AutoCAD's design-centric feature set includes the ability to create and edit 2D and 3D models, create assemblies, add annotation, generate documentation, share designs and work with team members on documents and models. It also includes tools for managing documents and their elements, communicating with other applications, embedding AutoCAD into other applications, and managing enterprise-wide workflows. In the following sections, we discuss the tools provided in AutoCAD, the features of different workspaces, the tools that are available in each workspace, and the features unique to the most advanced workspaces. The AutoCAD User Interface AutoCAD's desktop user interface is primarily made up of four main elements: The Applications window is the primary window of AutoCAD. It contains a wide range of tools and menu options. The file selection window, which shows the list of active AutoCAD files, is on the left side of the Applications window. The drawing window, which has a workspace and some toolbars, is on the right side of the Applications window. The drawing window also includes the drawing viewport, which is where drawings appear when they are opened, and a user-defined custom document window, which has the drawing panel and status bar. The drawing window consists of three panels. The top panel is the drawing viewport, where the drawing appears when it is opened. The middle panel is the drawing panel, where users can modify the current drawing. The bottom panel is the status bar, where users can view and control drawing settings. The drawing viewport is where users see the current drawing, including annotations and any saved objects. Users can use the drawing viewport to navigate the drawing. The drawing viewport is also where users can save drawings and other drawings, but users cannot save drawings from the drawing viewport

The thrust comes from a rocket, and spacecraft that go faster than the speed of light need to be in a special kind of orbit, called a "warp drive". We're pretty sure there's no fuel for space drives, but even if they did exist, one has to wonder how they would work. Would the spacecraft shoot out from the warp drive, and then be pulled back towards it at the speed of light? Or would they move away from the warp drive at an ever-increasing speed? Perhaps neither. Some people have speculated that the warp drive will simply pull the space vehicle to it, never moving away. If they stay on a flat trajectory, the vehicle will never go faster than the speed of light, and if it travels around a different curve, it will never go slower than the speed of light.
