I've gotten feedback from some readers that they've run into an issue where the software freezes when they've got the camera lens cap off, which suggested to me that it was a programming issue. Let's hope Adobe fixes that in an update. Adobe's customer support team, not to mention the users themselves, will welcome the addition of lens correction functionality in Lightroom 5. This feature intends to rectify the distortion and shift of perspective in the lenses of the camera. Users can check and alter these changes within the Photoshop CS6 app or even use the same equipment without needing to open it in Photoshop. Not very much has changed, but that's a good thing. I don't see anything that would hold me back from purchasing the new version, and I can't wait until it's available. Aside from some minor stability issues, I haven't had any complaints with the software, and the new features are quite promising. Its new Feature is the Soft Touch Tool which allows you to brush/smudge/paint over your images to give them a nicer looking feel. However, this feature could be a little more stack able. Sometimes I find an object will be gone Now some have complained about the performance and other issues. And I should point out the software is still stuggling in the new release. So far in my workflow I haven't noticed any lag in new features or issues. The soft-touch brush tool is still not stuggling once used. The only time I've noticed a problem is when I was using it overtime I notice that the tool appear to draw the image but it was going back and forth between the two uses. The only thing I've seem about the other feature that just appeared was it couldn't draw a double outline. I'm hoping that it gets fixed soon. But otherwise, it's great software.
