This is the first time FIFA has used real-life player data directly in the game. The motion capture team created more than 5,000 hours of gameplay footage to be used in the creation of the game, which included data from over 1,500 on-field actions, and 3,500 tackles and aerial duels, as well as 28,000 head collision events. FIFA 22 features a new Player Impact Visualization (PIV) system, which allows players to track and view their movement from a variety of angles. PIV data is presented in three parts: pace, acceleration, and direction. PIV data allows each player on the pitch to be perfectly visualised and follows the player in every action on the pitch, including aerial duels, tackles, off-the-ball actions, and finishing chances. Konami also utilises motion capture data to better understand how to balance the game and the game mechanics. This includes making sure players won't get over-powered in certain scenarios (e.g., rushing the penalty area) or overpower weaker opponents. The PIV in FIFA 22 is accompanied by a new Team Experience Visualization (T.E.V.), which has several new features. The T.E.V. allows players to be analysed by comparing their overall game statistics to other players. FIFA 20 introduced a new Player Trajectory Visualization (PTV) system, which allowed players to be analysed based on their passing style and location. The T.E.V. was also introduced to analyse the position of the players on the pitch and track their movement. The team at Konami are continuing the development of the T.E.V., and are looking to take it to a new level in FIFA 22. The T.E.V. is presented in four parts, which are the Pitch, Time, Position and Angle. The Pitch section tracks players' positioning on the pitch and areas of interest (e.g., goal). This allows the game to be tailored to each player's playstyle, with high-intensity or position-oriented players being shown in a different way. The Time section shows the timing of the players' overall actions, while the Position section shows the player's post-tackle position. Annotating the Player Trajectory System (PTS) marker on the player's body illustrates their movement on the pitch.
