As described earlier, the satellite tracking instrument family has consisted of several members over the past two decades. Recently, more and more important research, development, and pilot phase projects in the space area are initiated by universities and by industry. Even though funding per participant is much less than that for spaceflight missions, universities and industry can initiate their projects under the advantage of less central budgets. If this sounds too technical to you, then the basics of the satellite tracking instruments are covered in this section. If you already have some basic knowledge, you may want to skip this section and jump straight to ‘calibrating the GPS receiver and sensor’ to get started!

>>> To be released in September 2014. Evaluation of decellularized adult porcine skin as a temporary substitute for human dermis grafts. This study was conducted to evaluate the use of decellularized adult porcine dermis as a temporary implantable human skin substitute. Adult porcine dermis and human fibroblast-populated collagen (FPC) were decellularized by treatment with 1% sodium dodecyl sulfate, 1% sodium deoxycholate, and 0.1% (w/v) Triton X-100 for 3 days. Decellularized adult porcine dermis was implanted into wounds made on the backs of non-human primates for up to 6 weeks. Changes in the recipient sites were evaluated clinically and histologically. The mechanical properties of the recovered grafts were examined using tensile testing. Decellularized adult porcine dermis maintained its collagenous structure without any appreciable change in its mechanical properties compared to native adult porcine dermis. The innermost portion of the grafts was more firmly adhered to the host tissue.

To investigate the possibility of long-term survival, decellularized adult porcine dermis grafts were implanted into wounds created on human volunteers for 3 and 6 weeks. After 3 weeks, histological analysis showed that the original decellularized adult porcine dermis was replaced by human dermis-like tissue, and this tissue exhibited similar mechanical properties to normal human dermis. This study indicates that decellularized adult porcine dermis is a useful temporary human dermis graft and may be useful as a skin substitute for soft-tissue coverage in covering large wounds or as a skin graft for skin-graft take.January 31, 2017 Some of the best strawberries you'll get this season! There are so many wonderful things to do in the spring around here. We just returned from our annual trip to the Botanical Gardens in Ft. Lauderdale. We love going out to visit with the botanists there to see the latest blooms and new plantings. This was so cool! A new camellia planting in the nursery area. We had our own little patch 3e33713323
