In 2017, we worked on WebGL Panels, a canvas delivery platform that lets developers programmatically position their canvas in a panel. We deployed our first version of this technology onto the web and it received a lot of interest from developers. The key benefit of WebGL Panels is that they can provide a thicker and more immersive canvas that can easily handle even large images. Most importantly, browsers have access to the GPU of the device, which can use the best processing power available and can do so in a very efficient way. In addition, we kept augmenting the platform with features like hotspots and click areas for interacting in 3D. We got a lot of interest in using SVG and Canvas Panels, said Olivier Polet, Adobe’s senior web architect. Next, we explored the implementation of these technologies in a true web-browser. Last year, we worked on WebAssembly Panels, a canvas delivery platform that lets developers programmatically position their canvas in a panel.
