Since introducing the iPad Pro last October, I've been waiting (okay--I admit that I've been pestering) for its use of color-field-painting look to have the full Photoshop-like dimension of Adobe's mobile app. In the past, Adobe's mobile apps have required that you have to move on to a regular desktop version to do the advanced color corrections of light and dark with a "painting" brush. I'm happy to say that it now works on the iPad Pro, too, with a very sweet and smart interface. As you can see in the screen above, the brush is simple to use. You click where you want to paint, and you paint with that brush, so to speak, with the left-right motion of your brush. It feels natural. That's important; if you want to flatter someone's face or remove skin imperfections, you have to use a less-smooth brush. Later, when I went to import images, I still found it a bit of a pain, because, as I say in People, I feel like it doesn't really buy me a lot besides being able to see things sorted by common properties. Over the past couple of years, I was changing the order of my catalogs, and Lightroom asked me if I wanted to keep the original viewing when I imported an image. For some reason, it took me a while to learn what that really means. It was another clue of how different Lightroom is from Bridge, which always moved the duplicates to the top, and where each copy retains its original clip size. I used to think that keeping the size of the original clip was a good thing, and even went so far as to instruct various teachers to duplicate their images in the way they wanted to see them. Anyway, now I can't remember why I did. Maybe it was because I use my images in the way I want them to look in the first place.
