In general, a decorative aluminum alloy sheet is produced by forming an aluminum alloy into a sheet-like configuration, subjecting the obtained sheet-like aluminum alloy to painting, printing, and the like to thereby impart a decorative pattern on a surface thereof, and then joining the decorative aluminum alloy sheet to an aluminum alloy plate. During the production of such a decorative aluminum alloy sheet, a fillet is formed between the aluminum alloy plate and the decorative aluminum alloy sheet to facilitate the subsequent bonding of the decorative aluminum alloy sheet. Among conventional methods for producing a fillet are those in which an aluminum alloy having a greater hardness than that of an aluminum alloy plate is stacked on the aluminum alloy plate to cause a bond between the aluminum alloy and the aluminum alloy plate, and then the aluminum alloy is removed to thereby produce a fillet. However, in cases where a layer of an aluminum alloy having a smaller hardness than that of the aluminum alloy plate is stacked on the aluminum alloy plate to bring a steel sheet into direct contact with the aluminum alloy plate, a failure in production is likely to occur in that the aluminum alloy is cracked or the aluminum alloy plate is scratched or chipped away. Further, a fillet made by such a conventional method is less likely to have a high strength, failing to ensure smooth subsequent bonding of the decorative aluminum alloy sheet and the aluminum alloy plate. A method is known in the art in which aluminum and a copper alloy, ceramics, glass, or the like, as opposed to an aluminum alloy, are joined by using sintered powder, to thereby manufacture a fillet. However, since the sintered powder is not bonded to the aluminum alloy plate and the aluminum alloy plate is scratched or chipped away during the sintering step, the method has a problem in that a failure in production is likely to occur in that the resulting fillet is low in quality or cracks occur in the aluminum alloy plate. A method is also known in the art in which an aluminum alloy and an aluminum alloy plate are joined, where the aluminum alloy plate is pierced with a

A method for processing electroencephalographic (EEG) signals to transform the signals into synthetic or binary EEG signals of features indicative of states of vigilance in the sleeping human subject. EEG signals which exhibit spontaneous waking with a state of vigilance can be considered as the features of a human waking state which can be used to obtain the information on the state of vigilance of the subject, especially in case of the sleeping subject. human subject is described. Q: Multiple models with foreign key to same entity I want to create a reference tables for each model. I have a "thumbnail_image" table with columns thumbnail_id, image_id, thumb_width, thumb_height Now I am working on a model that requires foreign keys to "thumbnail_image" table. I know that I can create another table to store the foreign keys and add them in the model. What is best way to do that without creating a reference tables for each models. A: What you want is called Polymorphic relations, you can read it here. On top of that, I found this gem that might be of help to you.
